

New Special Education Association Launched - The National Association Of Parents With Children In Special Education (NAPCSE)

Help for Parents with Children in Special Education

For Immediate Release

WASHINGTON, D.C./EWorldWire/May 25, 2005 --- Today, a new national association has been launched for parents of children with special needs to promote a sense of community and provide a national forum for their ideas. The National Association of Parents with Children in Special Education (NAPCSE) has been established for parents who had no national organization to call their own. With the recent changes in the laws affecting special education, there is a heightened awareness of the importance of parents knowing their children's rights and the responsibilities of the educational programs in which they participate.

Under the leadership of Dr. George Giuliani and Dr. Roger Pierangelo (both graduate school professors in departments of special education and the authors of over 20 books on a variety of topics in the field of special education), NAPCSE serves the interest of parents with children in special education by providing the latest special education news updates, laws, information, resources and a forum to help them become their children's best advocate. Also with the Ask the Experts resource, members have the opportunity to ask professionals in the field very specific questions pertaining directly to their children.

NAPCSE is committed to helping parents stay abreast of current issues that are shaping the field of special education, and affecting the lives of their children and their futures. NAPCSE also supports the highest educational standards, and innovation in educational research. NAPCSE works to enhance and build public support for high quality special education programs and strengthens its community through networking, research, publications, and membership benefits.
