For Immediate Release

WASHINGTON, N.J./EWORLDWIRE/June 26, 2006 --- For some college students, understanding and identifying an appropriate internship to prepare for a future career is often left until the last year or two of college. For Northeastern University student Maureen McLaughlin, who just completed her first year, knowing now what pursuits interest her and then matching them with the right internship put her a step ahead of others.

Enrolled in a five-year program at Northeastern that gives her a projected graduation in 2010, McLaughlin's interests thus far are in developing her journalism skills. The Washington, New Jersey, student undertook her internship at World Internet Marketing, Inc. because it offered a challenging range of activities.

"The unique thing about this internship is that I can gain experience in an area outside of my studies: public relations -- I can try it out," explains McLaughlin about the reason for choosing the internship.

McLaughlin describes that this scope of exposure is possible in her internship because she multitasks with several responsibilities: editing press releases and interacting with clients, while focusing on her own project - to develop a website with news-related content that affects a wider, international audience.

"The office environment is open, and the people are friendly," commented McLaughlin. Even though the internship is not a requirement for credit at her university, she enjoys the work. "I can gain experience which is helping me to identify what field to pursue," McLaughlin stated.

Originally a native of Brooklyn, New York, McLaughlin moved to her current town in New Jersey in December of 2005. Aside from her studies, she works as a lifeguard and enjoys traveling as a hobby.
